DENISE COTE, District Judge:

Plaintiff Katerin Escalante ("Escalante") brings this action pursuant to § 205(g) of the Social Security Act, 42 U.S.C. § 405(g), seeking review of the final decision of the Commissioner of Social Security ("Commissioner") denying her eligibility for Supplemental Security Income ("SSI") benefits as provided for under the Social Security Act ("the Act"). The Commissioner has moved for judgment on the pleadings affirming his final decision. Escalante has cross-moved for remand for further proceedings to address any legal error or to develop the record. For the following reasons, Escalante's motion is granted. The case is remanded to the Commissioner pursuant to sentence four of 42 U.S.C. § 405(g) for further proceedings consistent with this Opinion.

Background

The following facts are taken from the administrative record and are undisputed. Escalante was born in 1989. She dropped out of school in the ninth grade. Apart from occasionally babysitting a young cousin, Escalante has never worked. She claims that from June 3, 1990, she has suffered from disabilities that leave her unable to work and thus eligible for SSI benefits. These are principally obesity, asthma, headaches, and depression. The record indicates that on various occasions, Escalante has reported experiencing seizures and auditory hallucinations.

I. Medical Record

Escalante lives with her parents, sisters, and brother in the Bronx. According to a report submitted by Escalante in connection with her Social Security claim (and completed by Escalante's mother, Elvira Lozado ("Lozado")), Escalante spends most of her time inside the family's apartment, "drawing, reading . . . sometimes playing video games[, and] always listening to music." While Escalante "sometimes goes outside when it [sic] cool or cold," she has difficulty going outside by herself, because "[s]he gets nervous and shy and uncomfortable." The report states that Escalante "has trouble breathing, hearing voice [sic] and sometimes sees things." Escalante attended special education classes until the eighth grade, and dropped out of school in the ninth grade.

The medical evidence in the record dates from May 1997, when Escalante was taken to the emergency room at Beth Israel Medical Center ("Beth Israel") for treatment following an acute asthma attack. Beth Israel doctors diagnosed acute asthma exacerbation and an upper respiratory tract infection. Escalante was treated with albuterol, and upon discharge was prescribed penicillin, Tylenol, and Proventil syrup.

The next medical record begins over six years later. On November 20, 2003, Lozada brought Escalante to the emergency room of the Metropolitan Hospital Center ("MHC"). According to the physician notes, Escalante stated that she had been "hearing voices" for two days, "commanding [her] to hurt [her]self, telling her to go away, and say[ing] derogatory things to her." The examining physician at MHC noted that Escalante suffered from obesity, that she had a history of developmental delay, and that there was a significant family history of mental illness, including two uncles and Escalante's younger sister. Escalante is described as an "obese female, shy, poor eye contact, cooperative." While reporting auditory hallucinations, Escalante denied experiencing visual or tactile hallucinations. The examining physician's global assessment of functioning ("GAF") diagnosis was 35,¹ and he admitted Escalante to MHC for psychological inpatient treatment. Escalante was discharged from MHC in early December 2003 (the exact date is illegible). The notes from her discharge are virtually illegible, but do appear to indicate that Escalante had responded well to treatment. She no longer claimed to be hearing voices. The GAF diagnosis at discharge was 60.²

Over three years later, on March 20, 2006, Escalante was admitted to the emergency department at the Lincoln Medical and Mental Health Center ("Lincoln"), complaining of difficulty breathing, chest pain, and asthma. Lincoln's records indicate that Escalante weighed 283 pounds. She appeared to be in "mild/moderate distress" with "wheezing/crackles". The records do not indicate any psychological abnormality; rather, Escalante appeared "independent," "oriented to time, person and place," and had "normal speech."

² A GAF in the range of 51-60 indicates moderate symptoms (such as flat affect and circumstantial speech or occasional panic attacks) or moderate difficulty in social, occupational, or school functioning. DSM-IV-TR 34.

From February to May 2006, Escalante attended mental health treatment at Sound View Throgs Neck Community Mental Health Center ("Sound View"). At Sound View, Escalante was treated by psychiatrist Dr. Stewart Schwartz ("Schwartz") and social worker Bernice Rivas ("Rivas"). The Sound View intake form and interview notes from February 1, 2006 indicate that Escalante had recently dropped out of school. The interview notes reflect that Escalante has "a complex, leading to social phobia and no self-confidence due to being overweight." Escalante was "alert, appearing anxious and depressed[.]" She reported "no delusions [and] no hallucinations." Her GAF diagnosis was 55.

Escalante attended four further appointments with either Schwartz or Rivas at Sound View. On March 9, 2006, she was prescribed Zoloft, an antidepressant. Between March 9 and May 4, however, Escalante cancelled six scheduled appointments. On May 4, Escalante and Lozada attended an appointment with Schwartz. Escalante indicated to Schwartz that she "fe[lt] a little better" with the Zoloft. Schwartz confronted Escalante on her poor attendance record, which provoked an angry response from Escalante. According to Schwartz, Escalante "does not want to accept any responsibility for her . . . overeating even though she is nearly 17." Schwartz noted that the plaintiff was "not psychotic" and increased her Zoloft dosage. On May 8, Escalante and Lozada attended a session with Rivas, in which Escalante was described as alert and verbal. Rivas discussed Escalante's lackluster attendance, which was attributed to Escalante's "social phobia and feelings about her weight." Lozada agreed that it might help if she traveled with Escalante to the sessions, at least until Escalante began to feel more comfortable in public. Escalante told Rivas that she had not been experiencing delusions or hallucinations. Escalante's last session at Sound View was with Rivas on May 22. Escalante was described as "alert . . . normal mood." The session focused on school and Escalante's goals. Rivas wrote that Escalante was "not sure about choosing HS or GED, asking [Rivas] questions, [Rivas] providing [Escalante] with help, reinforcing her use of self-determination." Again, no delusions or hallucinations were reported, and another appointment was scheduled. Escalante did not attend this appointment, nor the three succeeding appointments scheduled thereafter. There are no further records of Escalante attending therapy sessions at Sound View.

Beginning on December 31, 2001, Escalante's treating physician was Dr. Arpita Datta. On February 27, 2009, following Escalante's application for New York state disability benefits and SSI benefits, Dr. Datta completed a report on Escalante's condition and functional level. According to Dr. Datta, since the end of 2001, she had seen Escalante approximately every three to four months. As of early 2009, Escalante was 62 inches tall and weighed in excess of 300 pounds. Her blood pressure was 140/90. Dr. Datta's treating diagnoses were asthma and obesity. For the asthma, Dr. Datta had prescribed Albuterol, Singulair, and use of a nebulizer. Escalante's experienced asthma attacks "intermit[edly][,] once to twice [per] year." In 2008, Escalante experienced only one acute asthma attack, but no "severe" attacks requiring a hospital visit. On January 23, 2009, however, the date of Dr. Datta's last examination, Escalante had exhibited wheezing. According to Dr. Datta, Escalante's only physical problems were "obesity and mild, intermittent asthma." Escalante was "otherwise normal." Furthermore, Dr. Datta indicated that Escalante's asthma responded well to the Albuterol that had been prescribed.

From a mental standpoint, Dr. Datta wrote that as of her most recent examination, Escalante displayed normal attitude, behavior, speech, thought, mood, and affect. Dr. Datta's functional assessment of Escalante was that Escalante had a "normal" ability to perform the "activities of daily living," and a "normal" ability to "function in a work setting." Dr.

Datta did not complete the section of the form pertaining to Escalante's ability to carry out work-related physical activities such as lifting/carrying or standing/walking. She did indicate that Escalante had "no limitation" in understanding and memory, sustained concentration, and social interaction. Nevertheless, Dr. Datta checked a box at the end of the form indicating that she could not "provide a medical opinion regarding this individual's ability to do work-related activities." Dr. Datta concluded the form by stating that Escalante should seek to "lose weight and lead a healthy life by surgery or dieting."

Escalante applied for SSI on January 28, 2009. She visited two consulting examiners in early 2009 while she was applying for disability benefits. Dr. Herb Meadow, a psychiatrist, examined Escalante and reported on her mental health. According to Dr. Meadow, Escalante came to the examination by taxi with Lozada, but stated that she could take public transportation on her own. In his report, Dr. Meadow states that Escalante has difficulty sleeping and "gets depressed at times with dysphoric moods". While "she states she still occasionally hears voices . . . what she actually describes are hypnopompic and hipnagogic phenomena." While Dr. Meadow found Escalante to be depressed, he described her "manner of relating [as] adequate" and her "cognitive functioning [as] low average." Dr. Meadow found that

Escalante "would benefit from psychiatric treatment," but he nevertheless found that Escalante "would be able to perform all tasks necessary for vocational functioning."

Dr. Marilee Mescon, a specialist in internal medicine, performed a consultative examination on March 24, 2009. Dr. Mescon's examination focused on Escalante's asthma and obesity. At the time of the examination, Escalante was 60 inches tall and weighed 310 pounds. Escalante told Dr. Mescon that her home nebulizer helped suppress her asthma attacks, and that she had not had a serious attack provoking a trip to the hospital in two years. Escalante did indicate to Dr. Mescon that when Escalante "is exposed to dust and when she has an upper respiratory tract infection, her asthma gets worse." Dr. Mescon wrote that Escalante is "a very pleasant, well-nourished, well-developed obese woman in no respiratory distress [who is able] to speak in full sentences." While demonstrating "some difficulty walking on her heels and toes," Escalante "[n]eeded no help changing for [the] exam or getting on and off the exam table. [She was able] to rise from [her] chair without difficulty." Dr. Mescon concluded, based on her examination, that "there would be no limitations in the claimant's capacity to sit or stand for short periods of time, but her ability to climb, push, pull, or carry heavy objects would be severely limited because of her obesity."

Escalante's SSI claim was denied at the initial administrative review stage, and Escalante requested a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ"). Escalante's hearing before ALJ Susan Wakshul took place on May 7, 2010. The ALJ appeared by videoconference from Baltimore, while Escalante testified in New York. Lozada also briefly testified at the hearing. The final witness was Alina Kurtanich ("Kurtanich"), a vocation expert.

At the hearing, Escalante testified that she could not get work because she was "severely overweight," had "trouble getting up," and was "afraid of going outside because people make fun" of her. She stated that Dr. Datta was her "regular doctor", but that she had recently seen a neurologist, Dr. Lyzette Velazquez for help with "chronic headaches." Escalante also testified that she experienced seizures, described as a "shocking [sensation]" in her head, and headaches of varying severity, which she testified she experienced most days of the week, and took Tylenol or Advil to alleviate. Escalante testified that she had difficulty sleeping, but that she had been prescribed Topamax, which seemed to help.³ The Topamax also helped stop the "shocking" in her head. Escalante further indicated that she had undergone an electroencephalogram ("EEG") test the week before at the behest of her doctor, in response to Escalante's description of her "seizures". The EEG results had not yet come in, and the ALJ directed Escalante to send a copy of the test results for inclusion in the administrative record.

In the course of her testimony, Escalante stated that while she gets tired after walking more than a block, she takes public transportation twice a week to visit the doctor. Otherwise, she does not leave her home. Escalante occasionally helps out with household chores like cooking, and tends to her own personal hygiene needs.

Lozada briefly testified that Escalante "hear[s] voices and sees things." Following her mother's testimony, Escalante stated that she did "hear[] voices and see[] things", but "not . . . quite as much as last year."

A vocational expert, Ms. Kurtanich, was the third witness at Escalante's hearing. The ALJ first asked Kurtanich whether jobs existed in the national economy for a person with no work experience who could only perform "light work" as defined in the Dictionary of Occupational Titles ("DOT"), with the following further limitations: "occasionally climb ramps and stairs; should never climb ropes, ladders, or scaffolds; can occasionally balance, stoop, kneel, crouch, and crawl; and should avoid concentrated exposure to environmental pollutants and extremes in temperature." Kurtanich responded that such an individual could perform work as a ticket taker, an electronic worker, and a garment sorter, as those positions are defined in the DOT.

The ALJ then asked Kurtanich whether this answer would change if the individual in question would only have occasional contact with coworkers, the public, and supervisors. Kurtanich responded that this would eliminate the position of ticket taker.

After the hearing, Escalante submitted a copy of her EEG report to the ALJ. The report is signed by Dr. Velazquez, and indicates that Escalante was referred by Dr. Datta. Escalante's EEG was normal.

II. The ALJ's Decision

The ALJ issued her decision on May 20, 2010. The ALJ found that Escalante was not disabled within the meaning of the Act since the date of her application, and was therefore not entitled to benefits.

The ALJ found that Escalante suffered from several "severe" impairments, including obesity, asthma, depression, and headaches. The ALJ noted that Escalante claimed to have experienced seizures, but that Escalante's EEG was normal. The ALJ therefore determined that what Escalante claimed to be seizures were not reasonably related to a medically determinable impairment.

The ALJ did not find that Escalante's impairments, whether singly or in combination, meet or are medically equal to one of the listed impairments in 20 C.F.R. Part 404, Subpart P, Appendix. 1. The ALJ also found that Escalante's mental impairments did not meet the criteria for a listed impairment. The ALJ based her analysis almost entirely on Escalante's own testimony about the scope of her impairment.

The ALJ next concluded that Escalante had the residual functional capacity ("RFC") to perform light work as defined in 20 C.F.R. § 416.967, with the further physical and social limitations that the ALJ posed in her hypothetical to Kurtanich during the hearing. In reaching the RFC assessment, the ALJ considered both the medical record before her and Escalante's own testimony. For the scope, severity, and limiting effects of Escalante's obesity, asthma, and headaches, the ALJ relied upon the report of Dr. Datta, the treating physician, and Dr. Mescon, the consulting examiner. For impact of Escalante's depression and alleged psychosis, the ALJ afforded little weight to Dr. Meadows' assessment of Escalante, because the ALJ found that Dr. Meadows' opinion that Escalante could perform all tasks necessary for vocational functioning was belied by his own clinical finding that Escalante suffered from a depressive disorder. While Dr. Datta's report indicated that Escalante's mental impairments would not prevent her from functioning normally, the ALJ does not appear to have relied upon this assessment. Finally, the ALJ found Escalante's own testimony generally credible on the symptoms she had been experiencing, but the ALJ found that Escalante's "statements concerning the intensity, persistence and limiting effects of these symptoms are not credible" to the extent they were inconsistent with the ALJ's findings on Escalante's RFC.

At the final step of the inquiry, the ALJ found that jobs exist in the national economy in significant numbers for a person with Escalante's RFC. As Kurtanich had testified, the ALJ found that Escalante could perform the jobs of electronics worker or garment sorter. The ALJ therefore denied Escalante's application for benefits, finding that she was not disabled within the meaning of the Act since the date of her application.

Escalante requested review by the Social Security Administration Appeals Council ("Appeals Council") on July 23, 2010. To supplement her review petition, Escalante submitted a form signed by Dr. Rachana Chowlera, which indicates that Escalante suffers from morbid obesity, hypertension, hyperlipidemia, hyperglycemia, and arthralgia. The typed form indicates that Escalante has applied for SSI benefits, and states: "Please fulfill patient's request in order to avoid exacerbation of his/her medical condition(s)." Additionally, the administrative record also includes the report of a magnetic resonance imaging scan (MRI) conducted on Escalante on April 2, 2010. The MRI was ordered by Dr. Velazquez. The ALJ's decision does not mention the MRI, and neither party attempts to construe its findings.

On December 22, 2010, the Appeals Council denied Escalante's request for review of the ALJ's decision. Escalante filed this action on January 10, 2011. Escalante and the Commissioner filed cross-motions for judgment on the pleadings on September 14 and September 15, respectively. Neither party filed an opposition to the other party's motion.

Discussion

I. Standard of Review

In reviewing a decision of the Commissioner, a court may "enter, upon the pleadings and transcript of the record, a judgment affirming, modifying, or reversing the decision of the [Commissioner], with or without remanding the cause for a rehearing." 42 U.S.C. § 405(g). A determination of the ALJ may be set aside only if it is based upon legal error or is not supported by substantial evidence. Rosa v. Callahan, 168 F.3d 72, 77 (2d Cir. 1999). "Substantial evidence" is "more than a mere scintilla. It means such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion."

Halloran v. Barnhart, 362 F.3d 28, 31 (2d Cir. 2004) (quoting Richardson v. Perales, 402 U.S. 389, 401 (1971)). Furthermore, if the findings of the Commissioner as to any fact are supported by substantial evidence, those findings are conclusive. Diaz v. Shalala, 59 F.3d 307, 312 (2d Cir. 1995). "Where there is substantial evidence to support either position, the determination is one to be made by the factfinder." Alston v. Sullivan, 904 F.2d 122, 126 (2d Cir. 1990).

The Commissioner will find a claimant disabled under the Act if the claimant demonstrates the "inability to engage in any substantial gainful activity by reason of any medically determinable physical or mental impairment which can be expected to result in death or that has lasted or can be expected to last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months." 42 U.S.C. § 423(d)(1)(A). The claimant's impairment must be "of such severity that he is not only unable to do his previous work but cannot, considering his age, education, and work experience, engage in any other kind of substantial gainful work which exists in the national economy." Id. § 423(d)(2)(A). The disability must be "demonstrable by medically acceptable clinical and laboratory diagnostic techniques." Id. § 423(d)(3).

The Commissioner uses a five-step process when making disability determinations. See 20 C.F.R. §§ 404.1520 & 416.920. The Second Circuit has described the process as follows:

First, the Commissioner considers whether the claimant is currently engaged in substantial gainful activity. Where the claimant is not, the Commissioner next considers whether the claimant has a "severe impairment" that significantly limits her physical or mental ability to do basic work activities. If the claimant suffers such an impairment, the third inquiry is whether, based solely on medical evidence, the claimant has an impairment that is listed in 20 C.F.R. Part 404, Subpart P, Appendix 1. Assuming the claimant does not have a listed impairment, the fourth inquiry is whether, despite the claimant's severe impairment, she has the residual functional capacity to perform her past work. Finally, if the claimant is unable to perform her past work, the burden then shifts to the Commissioner to determine whether there is other work which the claimant could perform.

Jasinski v. Barnhart, 341 F.3d 182, 183-84 (2d Cir. 2003) (citation omitted).

A claimant bears the burden of proof as to the first four steps, while the Commissioner bears the burden in the final step. Schaal v. Apfel, 134 F.3d 496, 501 (2d Cir. 1998). For evaluating the severity of mental impairments, there are additional regulations that require the implementation of a "special technique" that involves rating and documenting the degree of functional limitation resulting from the impairments in accordance with "four broad functional areas: (1) activities of daily living; (2) social functioning; (3) concentration, persistence, or pace; and (4) episodes of decompensation."

Kohler v. Astrue, 546 F.3d 260, 265-66 (2d Cir. 2008) (citing 20 C.F.R. § 404.1520a(c)(3)).

With respect to the determination of the nature and severity of a claimant's impairment,

[t]he SSA recognizes a "treating physician" rule of deference to the views of the physician who has engaged in the primary treatment of the claimant. According to this rule, the opinion of a claimant's treating physician as to the nature and severity of the impairment is given "controlling weight" so long as it is well-supported by medically acceptable clinical and laboratory diagnostic techniques and is not inconsistent with the other substantial evidence in [the] case record.

Burgess v. Astrue, 537 F.3d 117, 128 (2d Cir. 2008) (citation omitted). In general, "the opinion of the treating physician is not afforded controlling weight where . . . the treating physician issued opinions that are not consistent with other substantial evidence in the record, such as the opinions of other medical experts." Halloran, 362 F.3d at 32 (citation omitted).

An ALJ who refuses to accord controlling weight to the medical opinion of a treating physician must consider various "factors" to determine how much weight to give to the opinion. 20 C.F.R. § 404.1527(d)(2). Among those factors are: (i) the frequency of examination and the length, nature and extent of the treatment relationship; (ii) the evidence in support of the treating physician's opinion; (iii) the consistency of the opinion with the record as a whole; (iv) whether the opinion is from a specialist; and (v) other factors brought to the Social Security Administration's attention that tend to support or contradict the opinion. The regulations also specify that the Commissioner "will always give good reasons in [her] notice of determination or decision for the weight [she] give[s] [claimant's] treating source's opinion.

Id. (citation omitted). After considering these factors, the ALJ must "comprehensively set forth [his] reasons for the weight assigned to a treating physician's opinion." Id. at 33. Failure to provide good reasons for not crediting the opinion of a claimant's treating physician is a ground for remand. Burgess, 537 F.3d at 129. "Genuine conflicts in the medical evidence," however, "are for the Commissioner to resolve." Veino v. Barnhart, 312 F.3d 578, 588 (2d Cir. 2002).

In making such an evaluation, an ALJ must also "carefully consider the individual's statements about symptoms" along with all of the other evidence in the case record, and must make findings about the credibility of the claimant's statements.

See Evaluation of Symptoms in Disability Claims: Assessing the Credibility of an Individual's Statements, Soc. Sec. Ruling 96-7p, 61 Fed. Reg. 34,483, 34,484 (July 2, 1996). "An individual's statements about the intensity and persistence of pain or other symptoms or about the effect the symptoms have on his or her ability to work may not be disregarded solely because they are not substantiated by objective medical evidence." Id. An ALJ will consider the following factors when evaluating a claimant's symptoms: (1) the claimant's daily activities; (2) the location, duration, frequency, and intensity of the claimant's pain or other symptoms; (3) precipitating and aggravating factors; (4) the type, dosage, effectiveness, and side effects of any medication the claimant takes or has received for relief of his pain or other symptoms; (5) treatment, other than medication, the claimant receives or has received for relief of his pain or other symptoms; (6) any measures the claimant uses or has used to relieve his pain or other symptoms; and (7) other factors concerning the claimant's functional limitations and restrictions due to pain or other symptoms. 20 C.F.R. § 416.929(c)(3). Conclusory findings of a lack of credibility will not suffice; rather, an ALJ's decision "must contain specific reasons for the finding on credibility, supported by the evidence in the case record, and must be sufficiently specific to make clear to the individual and to any subsequent reviewers the weight the adjudicator gave to the individual's statements and the reasons for that weight." Soc. Sec. Ruling 96-7p, 61 Fed. Reg. at 34,484.

A finding of credibility made by an ALJ is entitled to deference by a reviewing court. The ALJ, "after weighing objective medical evidence, the claimant's demeanor, and other indicia of credibility . . . may decide to discredit the claimant's subjective estimation of the degree of impairment." Tejada v. Apfel, 167 F.3d 770, 776 (2d Cir. 1999) (citation omitted). As with any finding of fact, "[i]f the Secretary's findings are supported by substantial evidence, the court must uphold the ALJ's decision to discount a claimant's subjective complaints of pain." Perez v. Barnhart, 234 F. Supp. 2d 336, 341 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (quoting Aponte v. Sec'y Dep't of Health & Human Servs., 728 F.2d 588, 591 (2d Cir. 1984)). Thus, a determination of credibility will only be set aside if it is not set forth "with sufficient specificity to enable [a reviewing court] to decide whether [it] is supported by substantial evidence." Ferraris v. Heckler, 728 F.2d 582, 587 (2d Cir. 1984).

II. The ALJ Hearing and Decision

Escalante makes four arguments in urging remand. She argues that the ALJ failed to adequately develop the record and to properly consider Escalante's obesity in assessing Escalante's RFC. She also argues that the ALJ committed legal error in her evaluation of Escalante's credibility and that the ALJ relied upon flawed vocational expert testimony. Because the ALJ failed to adequately develop the record with respect to Escalante's treatment by Dr. Velazquez, remand to the Commissioner is necessary.

"[B]ecause a hearing on disability benefits is a nonadversarial proceeding, the ALJ generally has an affirmative obligation to develop the administrative record." Burgess v.

Astrue, 537 F.3d 117, 128 (2d Cir. 2008) (citation omitted).

"[W]here there are deficiencies in the record, an ALJ is under an affirmative obligation to develop a claimant's medical history" Rosa v. Callahan, 168 F.3d 72, 79 (2d Cir. 1999). Where those deficiencies occur in connection with records of an applicant's treating physician, the ALJ's affirmative obligation is especially strong. See Genier v. Astrue, 606 F.3d 46, 50 (2d Cir. 2010) (per curiam) (directing ALJ on remand to solicit statement and opinion from treating physician); Clark v. Comm. of Social Security, 143 F.3d 115, 118 (2d Cir. 1998) ("The law gives special evidentiary weight to the opinion of the treating physician."); Schaal, 134 F.3d at 505 ("[I]f the clinical findings were inadequate, it was the ALJ's duty to seek additional information from [the treating physician] sua sponte.").

At the hearing, Escalante told the ALJ that she had two "primary doctors", Dr. Datta and Dr. Velazquez. Indeed, in giving her testimony, Escalante referred more frequently to Dr. Velazquez. The ALJ requested that Escalante provide the results of the EEG, but did not inquire further. As Escalante's treating neurologist, Dr. Velazquez could be expected to provide insight into the least developed and most disputed aspect of the record: the assorted neurological impairments, including auditory hallucinations, seizures, sleeplessness, and the headaches that Escalante claims she suffers. Under these circumstances, the ALJ had an affirmative obligation to seek the opinion of Dr. Velazquez, Escalante's other treating physician and the one whom Escalante represented had the most recent insight into Escalante's mental condition. Failure to so inquire constitutes legal error, and requires remand.

Escalante's remaining contentions may be briefly addressed. Escalante's second argument, that the ALJ failed to consider the effect of Escalante's obesity on her other impairments, is meritless. The record contains ample evidence of the extent of Escalante's physical impairments, most notably obesity and asthma, and the impact these conditions have on her ability to perform various tasks. The ALJ explicitly took Escalante's obesity and asthma into account in analyzing her RFC.

Escalante is likewise incorrect that the ALJ failed to properly evaluate her credibility as a witness. When the record is supplemented with the evidence from Dr. Velazquez, however, it will be necessary to reevaluate Escalante's credibility in light of the expanded record.

Finally, Escalante takes issue with the ALJ's reliance on the vocational expert's testimony. The DOT does not address whether individuals who require the ability to sit and stand at will ("sit/stand option") are capable of performing a given occupation. SSR 83-12 (1983). Here, at the behest of the ALJ, the vocational expert considered whether jobs classified as light work in the DOT, with additional limitations including requiring a sit/stand option, exist in significant numbers in the national economy. In responding, the expert appeared to rely solely upon the DOT. In any proceedings on remand, the ALJ should seek clarification from the vocational expert as to the basis for any testimony that specific jobs that may be appropriate for Escalante may be performed with a sit/stand option.

Conclusion

The Commissioner's September 15, 2011 motion for judgment on the pleadings is denied. Escalante's September 14, 2011 motion for judgment on the pleadings is granted. The case is remanded to the Commissioner pursuant to sentence four of 42 U.S.C. § 405(g) for further administrative proceedings consistent with this Opinion. This judgment disposes of the action. See Sullivan v. Finkelstein, 496 U.S. 617, 624-25

(1990). The Clerk of Court shall close the case.
